I loved these books as a kid and happened upon the audiobook one day in the library as an adult. I thought--Why Not?. So I listened to it while driving for work and have not laughed out loud like that in a long time.

Now, every time I need a good laugh or a pick-me-up day, I check one out!

I still LOVE them and I am now 33!

leighs dad walked out on them because he loved his truck more than he loved anything elles.So when he did thatMom and leigh had to go sleep in of what I think is a gas station.An old broken gas station.After that leigh went to school and kids stole all of the good stuff out of hi lunchbox so he decided that he was going to put an alorm on his lunch box then he got introble because it went off in class for no reason.

Beverly Cleary is the only author that can successfully write from a child's point of view. She does so without being at all precocious or obnoxious. Even fifty years later, Ramona still holds up. I love how indignant she gets about things in her world that just aren't fair. Like when Susan stole her idea for the owl project and she got all the credit for it. That would have killed me when I was that age! Or what she thinks of her teachers ("Ramona was filled with love for Miss Binney.") Or when Ramona accidentally offended Beezus ("Pizza face!" And why shouldn't she call her that, they called each other pie face all the time!) and how incredibly guilty she was when she found out what that really means. All of that is so truthful to the way kids act and think. At the end of each book, there is never any moral, and the loose ends aren't always tied up neatly, which is very refreshing.

Needless to say, I boycotted that stupid goddamn movie with Selena Gomez (REALLY?!?) and some precocious child actor with an obnoxious first name.
